

Wool to bone

ISTOCK.COM/GIZMO

■ Keratin extracted from sheep's wool helped damaged bone regenerate in animals, producing tissue that was more organised and structurally similar to healthy bone than tissue grown with conventional collagen scaffolds. The discovery at King's College London, UK, could turn an abundant agricultural byproduct into a promising new material for regenerative medicine.